The chart shows the percentage of households with internet access in three countries between 2000 and 2020.

Overall, all three countries saw a clear increase over the period, but the gap between them narrowed. Country A remained the highest throughout, while Country C experienced the fastest growth.

In 2000, only about 20% of households in Country A had internet access, compared with 10% in Country B and just 3% in Country C. By 2010, the figure for Country A had risen to 60%, and Country B had reached 45%. Country C, however, remained below 20%.

Between 2010 and 2020, the pattern changed. Country C rose sharply to 70%, while Country A grew more slowly to 85%. Country B reached 80% by 2020. As a result, the difference between the three countries was much smaller at the end of the period than at the beginning.

Some people believe that online learning is as effective as traditional classroom learning. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Online learning has become a normal part of education, and some people now argue that it is just as effective as sitting in a classroom. While I accept that online study has clear advantages, I believe it cannot fully replace face-to-face teaching.

The main strength of online learning is flexibility. Students can watch recorded lessons at their own pace, pause when they are tired, and study from anywhere. For example, a student who works part-time can complete a course late at night, which would be impossible in a fixed timetable. This makes education accessible to people who cannot attend a campus.

However, online learning has serious limitations. It requires strong self-discipline, and many students are easily distracted by games or social media. In addition, discussing ideas with classmates and receiving immediate feedback from a teacher are difficult online. A classroom also provides routine and social contact, which are important for younger learners. These aspects are hard to reproduce on a screen.

In conclusion, online learning is a valuable option, especially for flexible or remote study, but it is not equally effective for everyone. A blended approach, combining online materials with regular classroom interaction, is likely to be the most practical solution.
